Golf Clubs

Through the Century

The game of golf has developed closely alongside the equipment. In the ancient game, clubs were much longer and flatter in design. Players gripped them in the palms of their hands and swung them around the body, bouncing them off their shoulders or biceps in the backswing. In 1603 clubs had shafts made of ash or hazel with a head of blackthorn, beech, apple, or pear. The lie was fatter and the heads much longer than present day clubs - about 1 inch from front to back and 4 to 5 inches long in the head. The majority of clubs were wooden with quaint names such as playclub, brassie, grassed driver, long spoon, short spoon and bathie, which implied a personal relationship between club and player. The irons, on the other hand, were for shots from particularly difficult places - hence a bunker iron, a rutt iron, track iron and so on. Over the years, the irons were used not only for recovery shots, but also for general approach play. By the end of the 19th century, a new range had been developed for longer shots - the mid irons, cleek, niblet and mashie, for example.
